31 Jul 2015 14:49:02 Z I can't put a bet on you 07 Jul 2015 20:41:05 Z There are some clear winners and losers in the tech industry at the moment. The mobile space is certainly a winner, with Facebook and Twitter particularly faring well, but the rest of the market is looking tired and behind the times. While you may not be able to call yourself a tech geek these days, you can still contribute to the technology world by donating to charities that operate in the tech space. Here are a few ideas for you to consider. Cancer research There are many charities that do a great job of raising funds for cancer research. The online crowd is certainly aware of the work being done by organisations like Cancer Research UK, which has been looking at ways to make cancer prevention more efficient for years. Some of the techniques being used include 3D printing and creating a fake Google. Most UK charities do plenty of work to help others affected by cancer and don't use them to make money. If you live in the UK, Cancer Research UK has a page where you can make a donation via JustGiving. Most donations are between £1 and £10, but you can choose your own giving level. The charity has lots of informative pages where you can find out more about its work.

Whilst it might not be possible to directly raise money for cancer research via a phone, tablet or laptop, there are other organisations that are doing just as good a job. There's plenty of support on the web to help you learn more about the kinds of research being done and how you can help. If you want to know more about how you can directly affect the work that charities like Cancer Research UK do, you should read this article. Maths There are plenty of charities that focus on maths education.

Here are two that have caught my eye: The AIME Foundation is a charity that's specifically focused on maths education in developing countries. It funds research, provides educational materials and works with partners to tackle problems with education in developing nations. It's dedicated to improving
